He became the object of an experiment and he was put into a state where he became a hollow human by the name of "baby boy". CEN's scientists were able to drain the liquid of his body and he was modified. They put various mechanics into his body so that it was both alien and human. Rack 'In Outbreak: The New Nightmare, you could buy anything,' ponders one of the most famous horror film directors of all time, Wes Craven - more commonly known to the world as a crowd pleaser who delivered two of the defining horror films of the 1980s, The Last House On The Left and The Hills Have Eyes. And now he wants to involve the community again, to offer a new instrument of storytelling to those who are feeling the need for more ideas while Craven's busy making his sequel to Dead & Breakfast. "Feeling the need for more ideas" is what led the filmmaker, a man who previously tapped the world of slasher film for years and years in the form of his Scream series, to create the Instrument of Storytelling. This special tool, inspired by the old photo-labs in Washington and Boston from the 1930s, has two types of lens: a portrait lens and a person lens. Click the photo below to see how they work in action. "Our version of the Instrument of Storytelling uses the same basic materials as the photo-labs — two funnels, two lenses and several cardboard optical toys — and puts them all in the hands of a player," explains Craven. "To see the Instrument of Storytelling at work, I recommend watching the trailer here. The person using the Instrument has to be a very intuitive person who is comfortable with tabletop games but also aware of her or his surroundings at all times. And at the same time he or she can have fun, be exposed to the ever-evolving world of storytelling, learn new things about effective storytelling and take an idea home and recreate it in their own way." To help you sculpt your own Outbreak: The New Nightmare in your own hometown, the team from Craven's company The Last Artist have written a book that is filled with 100 pages of Outbreak-related tips and tricks. The book, Spiral of Day & Night, was created to work in your local theatre, school or bookshop, and has 117 photographs and diagrams to help you piece together an Outbreak spot that clearly tells a complete story. New files with the following titles show you what you can pull off: Ælla (50 min) Ælla takes place in a deserted forest. From the entrance you have come towards the left, which will lead you directly to the former home of Hisako. In the kitchen is the knife which Hisako used to slit
