If you haven't been hanging out with some of our sister sites, StarTrek.com and TrekMovie, a lot of you might be pretty confused. If you've been reading us for years, you're probably well-versed in the various ways that Trek has been misrepresented and bastardized. Is there any single Trek episode, movie, or TV show that you love more than the others? Let's find out! On the other hand, if you're a new fan, then you might be as confused as we are. Those who aren't familiar with Star Trek: Nemesis might think that it's the worst Trek film ever made. On the other hand, if you're a die-hard fan of the previous films, you might be expecting something along the lines of Star Trek Into Darkness... Or, maybe you're just confused as to why we'd compare the two films. Which do you prefer? Whatever you prefer - it looks like you guys are pretty split. Today's Monday and the Star Trek: Nemesis season premiere was a bit of a mixed bag, drawing 7.2 million people in to US theaters to watch Benedict Cumberbatch and Michael Fassbender face off against Karl Urban's Capt. Kirk. That would be the second best number to the 7.8 million people who saw the original Star Trek, led by William Shatner. It's hard to compare the films without seeing them side by side, but we can see how they compare numerically. In 1999, the Star Trek: Nemesis finale drew 7.15 million people. That's a bit less than Star Trek Into Darkness, but it's close. Both films
