so he began placing bets with bookmakers on the internet, including the web-based sportsbook genius sports. and in 2007, with no intention of becoming a bookmaker himself, he founded a business that would eventually become betting assistant. when he created the company, walters knew that what he really needed was the tools to make his job easier. but he also had a deep understanding of the betting industry, having gone to college and played on sports teams with gamblers. so he created a new type of sportsbook, a service that could combine the credibility of a traditional bookmaker with the convenience of an internet sportsbook. the betting assistant platform was simple: walters would collect data on games, offer to take bets from customers, and then place those bets on the internet, including at genius sports. he partnered with a company called sportsbook america to take his bets for him. and the company's sportsbook, betonsports.com, would take most of the risk. at his seattle-area restaurant, walters made a few bets for customers who wanted to wager on basketball, but he never took a bet himself, he says. "i never made a bet on myself," he says. "i never won, i never lost." but he gained a reputation as a top football handicapper and had customers who wanted to place bets on the nfl. and in 2012, a friend of his who ran a sportsbook online asked walters to place a bet for him. that led to the creation of bettingassistant. the bill proposed by rep. steve daines (r-mont.), who sponsored the house version, would eliminate the individual states ability to allow betting on sports, which is currently prohibited by the professional and amateur sports protection act. the state-by-state gambling option would be a minor change in the legislation, which would not include a revenue-sharing provision.

all of the five experts interviewed by espn.com said they'd expect a boon in u.s. gambling revenues from sports betting. some of the money will come from overseas, but much of it will come from the united states, especially on super bowl sunday. the total haul for sports betting in the united states in 2014 is likely to be $1.6 billion, the panelists estimated. thats about one-fifth the size of the u.s. gambling industry overall. the five experts also agreed that the united states sports betting industry will grow to $3 billion in revenue by 2018. if that happens, its a bit of a marketing coup. each expert said the united states sports betting industry will develop a certain amount of sophistication by then. that sophistication will likely lead to less illegal gambling. many u.s. sportsbooks exist simply because they cant get licenses from international regulators like the international olympic committee or fifa. theyll have to be licensed by the u. sports leagues or the ncaa. the nba is the only major american sport without a significant presence in the u.s. sports betting market. the nfl, ncaa and nhl, however, have little to fear in the way of a downturn. the three leagues are already the leading sources of revenue for sports betting operators, and the projections are that theyll be able to avoid a downturn for at least the next three years. "i think the united states is the largest market for legal sports betting in the world," said shannon o'donnell, a vice president at the caesars sportsbook at the sportsbook at the wynnn. "i don't think there's any other market out there that comes close." 5ec8ef588b
