In fact, I love that, for now at least, Photoshop CC can simultaneously run without X11 or Windows on your computer, and without the dot matrix screen too. The cost of this is the need to have pretty much the best, flattest and largest monitor you can buy, a ton of RAM (18GB minimum) and a CPU powerful enough to keep up with Photoshop. Sometimes the price is worth it. So far, I haven't tested iOS but our review of the iPad Pro indicated that it was coming along nicely. I used to think that Lightroom was all about speed, but I've learned that it is not only that, but also about user friendliness. During the past 3-4 years when Adobe launched some new versions, it had tried to change its fully-fledged Photoshop suite into a new product called Adobe Creative Cloud. After an evaluation of the subscription and yearly fee, I decided that it was not the answer. The new subscription model is more expensive than the previous Photoshop CC subscription and the yearly fee that is paid on the Apple App Store is not only more expensive than the previous yearly fee, but also $49 more than that of Adobe Photoshop CC. If the previous model was not attractive to me, the new one is even less so. In fact, I'd prefer to pay the original price for Photoshop alone. For those who are somewhat wondering why the new model is not cheaper, it's also more difficult to revert back to the three version pricing. By the way, I've looked at the different subscription types, and on top of the $9 or $10 monthly fee, you'll also be paying $30 every so often, if not every time you purchase the app. And I have paid many times over the years, with a valid Adobe CC account.
