What would have been a nice to-do list for 2013 has turned into a nice to-do list for 2019 in the form of Adobe's powerful foray into the realm of computer vision (see "A Dream of Machine Vision," Jan. 2013). On top of the Photoshop CC, Adobe has released Photoshop Mix, a new app that would let you switch between photos in Adobe Lightroom, the first part of which went public on Wednesday as part of a pre-release version of Photoshop.com. This is yet another step toward Apple's upcoming iOS Moments (or Apple TV+), expected to debut this fall. There are impressive features in this digital photography app, including the ability to have a robot with Photoshop sense what it thinks it takes. By using the computer vision, virtual-reality and AI technology, it can take different images and even convert them into a 3D model. It can also create 3D-like effects, video, panoramas and other creations. But there are also some limitations to it, like the use of some huge files, as well as the inability to adjust exposure, color and display a few other tweaks. Read the full review at iCrap.com. If you're lucky, you can use the Adobe extensions that help speed up Photoshop's Corel Draw import, the Ada + A+ plugin for Photoshop, which can be used either online or offline. I think that these extensions have definitely made Lightroom 4 better. In addition to this, Adobe has included built-in support for DwgSense 3, a web standard that helps separate the page design from the type design. This also means that the page layout should be preserved when re-saving.

Along with other powerful tools, this feature uses data-driven tools to analyze an image's composition and color. It then looks for the face and places a mask over it. Photoshop also introduces three new image and video effect filters. They include several presets, and each affects an entire image or video frame. The focus of the filters is to enhance specific areas of your image, but they don't always produce the desired effects.
