A simple Browse or latest-version link sharing approach was designed to enhance the workflow of working on content while further reducing the number of non-critical files to be shared. To add to this collaboration, the desktop apps now enable a simple way to create and augment images in the browser from the desktop editor. This enables you to ingest and edit in the browser, then export to Photoshop directly from the desktop apps and even the latest version of Photoshop. For many, this will represent a major shift in how they design, share, review, and export. At Photoshop's MAX session, Adobe invited creative professionals to create their best examples of the new sharing process. Using the latest Photoshop desktop apps, professionals can create and edit in the browser, then markup their work in the browser and share with colleagues. With collaboration as its core, there's no need for a complex or large network of collaborators to handle multiple versions of content. Users can work on documents, images and other content in the browser and export directly to Photoshop or other Creative Cloud apps. Users can even share images and full document sets with colleagues for collaboration and feedback. While this can be a challenge when sharing content across social media networks, with the new Share for Review extension, collaboration on documents, images and other content is enabled without requiring a large group of collaborators.
