I think you hit on a good point, T.N.S.. Adobe is already aware of who you are. Yes, you are using a pre-release version, but this is the release candidate, not the final version. When an unreleased version of software is available for review, the software doesn't really know who you are because you haven't lied to the software yet. That's the point here. In addition, the software creates its own temporary folder, in order to place working data on the computer's hard disk, where it can exist in its highest (most useful/preferred, etc.), and safest, form. Adobe can also do this because the user has chosen to perform a procedure that allows the software to do this specifically. Such as, when you choose to [autodetect resolution] you are giving the software time to update its images in your hard disk, which Adobe can then do, if they choose. They are not doing anything wrong, nor are you. The speed improvements in Lightroom were noticeable in my experience, but I think you can gain significant improvement with the new version of Photoshop if you often have lots of memory to spare and you need to supply images from a high-capacity hard drive. In some respects, Photoshop now actually limits you to the hardware that Adobe has available for making the most of the software. For example, it prevents you from saving a file if your hard disk isn't big enough to hold a certain number of 10MP files. Of course, you can still add that file to your catalog later if you have a bigger disk.
