I know undefined is used if a variable is not specified, but what about null? For example, i have function foo() which takes parameter b as optional, and if I pass b it will cause error. const foo = (b?:string) => { console.log(b) } Now, if I call foo(null) why won't it cause an error? A: The difference between null and undefined is that null (as name says) is "the value of the undefined literal" which is the undefined value (whereas undefined is an empty string). The syntax for undefined is : undefined where as the syntax for null is just null. Here's the documentation: and Booking a hike or other travel activity is often done on-line or via a phone. Though great technology is available for booking activities, it is a time consuming, paper based process. At busy times, a shopper will face long lines and slow customer service. In addition, the booking process requires a shopper to call a number, enter numbers or take notes while the shopper hears through the phone a confirmation of booking, then a confirmation of payment, and then a confirmation that the booking is in the works. Sometimes the shopper cannot reach someone to confirm the booking or the booking confirmation is not received. This system can also be inefficient in allocating the right number of people to fulfill a request. Online systems may use booking agents to generate and send a confirmation for a tour
