The machine will still boot and the BIOS responds with the usual message telling how many key depressions.Last month, at a wedding, I was involved in a conversation about economics, and it reminded me that a comment I saw on Facebook this week was quite apt. It’s not unusual to talk about economic considerations at weddings. If you are married into a wealthy family, chances are, you’ll get the lawyer in the family, or perhaps the doctor, but the designer and head gardener can be tough to find. But, in this case, the bride’s father happened to mention that he had a good relationship with the CEO of his company. “Yeah, Dad,” the son quipped, “and I’m the butcher in the family.” It took me a moment to think about the offensiveness of that statement, but then I realized that the son was basically saying that he was the poor man’s son, that his dad was somehow at the mercy of a rich man. And if that’s how the son felt, and I think he really meant that, then I have to say that his reaction to my comment is not surprising. He’s incredibly well-off, and he’s probably brimming with resentment and envy. It’s the same resentment and envy that you can see in another interesting comment that I saw on Facebook this week. It was made by someone who I know only as “Chris.” He’s an intelligent guy, who has been a successful technology developer for many years, but today, he says he’s tired of making money and he wants
