A Pelvic hyperostosis syndrome, defined as hyperostosis either purely macroscopically or endoscopically and confirmed by histological examination, was observed in 18 of 51 gynaecologic and obstetric patients and in three of 14 patients having spinal cord lesion (group 2). The three cases of spinal cord lesion had encephalomyelitis disseminata (herpes simplex) and developed secondary hyperostosis due to the sequelae of the viral disease. The group of gynaecologic and obstetric patients with pelvic hyperostosis had a different clinical symptomatology from the patients of the spinal cord lesion group. In all gynaecologic and obstetric patients and in the spinal cord lesion group a similar histological picture, characterized primarily by a significant increase of bone tissue in subperiosteal and subendosteal region, was observed. The etiopathogenesis and the differences among the gynaecologic and obstetric patients, the spinal cord patients and the general population are discussed. The advanced age of the gynaecologic and obstetric patients may be considered as an additional factor in the etiology of this syndrome, however additional studies are needed to find the other cause of signs and symptoms.
